ABSTRACT

This work focuses on new statistical methods that improve the criteria used to select the correct model that describes a data set. It presents briefly some of the criteria mentioned in bibliography. It also presents bootstrap and jackknife methods used for improvement of parameters in general. These methods are being used for the first time in this work for the improvement of the variance term of the model selection criteria. The applications studied in this work are about linear regression models that include also data with outliers.